I wanted to know if there is a fundamental difference between time and frequency Fourier transform such that the Fourier transform looks as shown in the red box which is a 1-D representation of frequency spectrum. Any help would be appreciated. A: The Fourier transform of a time signal is a single number. In the figure the frequency spectrum from 0 to 2π is plotted in red and is indeed a single number. The Fourier transform of a signal of finite duration is a sum of many such numbers. This is why we instead plot spectra like this, to make it easier to visualize the time evolution of a particular frequency. Optimization of the internal transcribed spacer 2 region of the ribosomal RNA gene for identification of Diaporthe longicolla. Diaporthe longicolla, the causal agent of Japanese bakanae of rice, is difficult to identify in routine laboratories because the isolates occur only in Japan and there is no culture method available. We attempted to identify D. longicolla isolates by using molecular techniques. The sequences of the internal transcribed spacer (ITS) regions of the ribosomal RNA (rRNA) gene were examined to obtain sequence differences between D. longicolla and other Diaporthe species, which led us to choose the ITS2 region as a target for the species identification. D. longicolla isolates obtained in Japan were morphologically identified and ITS
